

Keystone pipeline opponents hail end to eminent domain effort

By NANCY GAARDER
Omaha World-Herald

Opponents of the now-scuttled Keystone XL pipeline hailed an agreement between a Canadian company and Nebraska landowners to terminate the company's efforts to condemn their land.

On Monday, a Madison County District Court judge accepted an agreement between TC Energy Corp. and the Johnson and Herrick families to rescind condemnation proceedings.

In June, TC Energy Corp., formerly TransCanada, said it was ending its decades-long effort to build a crude oil pipeline from Alberta to Nebraska. From there, the pipeline would connect to a system that reached the Gulf Coast. The company announced its decision after President Joe Biden in January revoked a necessary permit.

Jane Kleeb, founder of Bold Nebraska, credited the work of everyday Nebraskans with stopping the pipeline.

"Land justice happened only because of the hard work of citizens, grassroots organizing, and a legal team who believed the land was worth protecting," she said.

Mark Hefflinger, also with Bold Nebraska, said about 60 landowners were in a situation similar to the Herrick and Johnson families.

He said pipeline opponents hope that TC Energy will reach similar agreements with the other families.

Additionally, pipeline opponents want to see easements granted to TC Energy be revoked so that they can't be transferred to another company.

TC Energy declined to comment on how it would handle additional terminations of condemnation proceedings or any cancellation of voluntary easements.

"It would be inappropriate to speak to matters before the courts," the company said in a written statement. It did note that the project has been canceled.

"I think masks are something to think about," Dr. Brett-Major said. "We should be thinking about whether or not we have respiratory symptoms. We should be thinking about whether or not we're sick, and we should be thinking about whether, if we're sick, we ought to be around others, whether that's school or otherwise. So, I think masks are something to think about. They are a tool for civility, and they are a tool for practical safety."

Physical Therapy to life. Since that day, the two, along with a caring and motivated staff, have provided patients with a variety of physical therapy services.

Long familiar with Rock Valley, the Zimmermans say now is the right time to align the two organizations and continue a marvelous pathway of bettering lives.

"We've been acquainted with Rock Valley Physical Therapy since the 1990's, when I completed one of my long clinical rotations there during physical therapy school," said Jeff Zimmermann. "I knew back then that Rock Valley was doing things differently than most everyone else."

"When we founded Specialized Physical Therapy in 2008, we did our best to model our business after Rock Valley."

Excited at the challenges ahead, Rock Valley believes it found the right people and right places to move forward with its mission enhancing the lives of those they serve.

"Rock Valley Physical Therapy is excited to expand our footprint into Nebraska," said Debbie Healy, Vice-President

Growth and Development, for Rock Valley Physical Therapy. "We are fortunate to be able to partner with Mike, Jeff and Jacque and to provide additional resources to further their staff development, expand their physician relationships and continue to help Make Better Lives in their communities."
